Instructions for finding the Ullage or Actual Quantity of Liquor in lying Casks full or partially full

1 See that the cask is perfectly level and that the bung hole exactly in the centre at the top

2 Pass the bung rod with the triangular point downward through the centre of the bung hole until it touches the bottom of the cask. Bring it to the side of the bung hole and read the figures marked on the side of the rod visible above the surface of the cask. Then find the thickness of the top stave (in casks of 50 to 60 gallons capacity this is generally about $\frac{1}{4}$ of an inch or as the rod is marked in inches and tenths of an inch seven tenths) deduct the thickness from the outside depth or diameter the difference will be the true internal diameter of the cask known as the bung diameter

3 Carefully wipe the rod and again insert it through the bung hole taking care to keep it upright. Lower it slowly and steadily through the liquor so as not to break the surface and directly it touches the bottom press it downwards slightly and immediately withdraw it. Note the point to which it is wet taking the wet tenth when the line falls between two divisions

4 Divide the number of wet inches and tenths by the bung diameter previously found refer the quotient to the table appended below directly opposite which will be found its equivalent. Multiply the equivalent by the content of the cask as marked upon the head the product will be the actual quantity of liquor in the cask.

Instructions for proving Liquor in Casks

Directly the cask is gauged, have the contents thoroughly stirred up, then fill a sample jar with the liquor and insert the thermometer and if the jar be large enough the hydrometer at the same time. Note where the mercury comes to rest, taking the higher figure when it stops between two divisions. Then take the hydrometer reading, noting the division immediately under the surface of the liquor. Refer to the tables for correction of temperature, if that found differs from the temperature at which the instrument was standardized. The result will be the true strength.

Note as to Casks

The bung rod will only give the correct figures when the cask is of the regular shape, i e, when, as in English beer casks, the outer line is a regular curve. If a cask rises towards the bung hole, it will hold from 2 to 5 per cent less than the contents shown by measurements on the bung rod. Similarly, if it is flattened, it will hold more than the calculated contents. Care should be taken in dipping a cask to see that the end of the rod does not slip into the space between two staves and that it rests fairly upon the bottom of the cask.

FORM I D 21 [Para 110 (note)]

The Cultivation and Manufacture of Gánja, by C BENSON, Esq, M R A C, Deputy Director, Agricultural Branch Bulletin No 29 of 1894.

The true hemp plant (Cannabis Sativa) though grown here and there in most parts of the Presidency in backyards, is found as a regularly-cultivated field crop in only two localities, viz., in the Malayali villages on the Javádi hills in North Arcot, and in one or two villages in the Bapatla taluk of Kistna district. It is also raised to a certain extent in the hilly parts of Vizagapatam and Ganjám, but there seldom more than a few plants are grown by each person.

The Javádis are a low hill range covered with jungle, amongst which the Malayali villages lie scattered, few of them consisting of more than three or four huts. Each village has a small patch of land cleared for cultivation near by, and there, in almost all cases, a plot or two of hemp will be found growing. The Malayalis claim to be Vellalas, but except for purposes of trade and barter have little or no connection with the people of the plains. They also claim to alone possess the knowledge necessary for the manufacture of gánja—a practice which has been carried on, they state, in these hills from time immemorial. They attribute the fact that the growth of the crop is confined to the hills merely to the ignorance of the people of the plains, and state that if the latter knew how to deal with the crop, they would easily grow it outside the hills.

On the hills cultivation is carried on in small plots, the natural fall of the ground preventing any considerable tolerably level area being found in one place, although to a certain extent the plots are terraced. In these plots the Malayalis raise the ordinary dry food-grains of the country for their own consumption, and with them the hemp plant alternates, hemp not being ordinarily taken on the same land in two successive years. The soil is free, friable and open, derived directly from the rocks on which it rests, thoroughly well drained, and appears to be fairly fertile. For hemp, it receives a heavy dressing of cattle dung, without which it is said to be hopeless to raise the crop. This manure is spread on the surface in May or June, before the first rains allow of ploughing being begun. As soon as the land is sufficiently moistened it is ploughed and the operation is repeated three or four times at convenient intervals until some time in July, when the seed is sown. Sowing is done by dropping the seed, at the rate of five or six seers per acre, in a furrow opened with a plough, the seed being covered with soil drawn over it by the feet of the sower. The seed is sown in rows about 3 feet apart, and during the growth of the crop the spaces between the rows are worked and kept clean by ploughing and weeding. The young plants appear in about a week after sowing, and when about three weeks old they are partially thinned out, and when they reach to a foot high they are earthed up by means of a plough which is run along on either side of the rows. This latter process aided by hand-weeding at intervals of about a fortnight, thrice repeated, keeps the whole land clean.

When the crop is about four months' old, the anxieties of the cultivator commence and the crop has to be examined carefully and frequently, so that any male plants—called female by the ryots—may be detected and removed. Detection of the male plants is only possible when the flowers appear. Their entire removal is absolutely essential to securing a crop of gánja, as otherwise the whole crop runs to seed. The removal of the male plants is a continuous process, going on as the plants are detected. Notwithstanding this care a certain amount of seed actually sets.

Some time early in January the harvest begins. It continues up to March. Plants are ready for cutting as soon as the leaf turns yellow and begins to drop. At the same time the spikes of female flowers also turn yellow. The crop is never cut on a damp or cloudy day.

In harve ting the ripe plants are cut bodily tied into small bundles and carried to the threshing floor of the village There the spikes are stripped off the stems with a few of the leaves and the stems are thrown away The material thus collected is spread out on the floor in the sun during the middle of the day for three four or five hours and then loosely rolled in the hand to work out such seed as may have been formed and to break up the leaf that remains The working also causes the spikes to stick to one another to some extent The broken leaf is then winnowed out collected and powdered

The manufacture then begins A closely woven bamboo ba ket is taken and dusted inside with leaf powder Into it is placed a layer of the spikes an inch or an inch and a-half deep The spikes are then trodden under foot by a man working round and round on his heels in the basket four or five times the man supporting himself on a stick whilst the basket is held steady by two others If the basket be large enough two men do the treading grasping each others shoulders to steady themselves Layer over layer of the spikes is thus made in the basket till it is full each layer being separated from the next by a little leaf dust When the basket is full its contents are turned out on a piece of flat hard ground and on the top of the pile a large flat stone is placed upon which are piled other stone to weight and compress the heap The weights remain thus till next morning at about 8 or 9 A M when each layer is taken out separately broken into small bits and spread in the sun to dry Whilst spread out thus the pieces are trampled on with the heel and turned over from time to time to secure proper drying In the evening the pieces are again repiled and weighted and next day again turned out to dry the process being repeated till the whole is thoroughly dried

Great importance is attached to the thoroughness of the treading the sufficiency of the pressing and the completeness of the drying the quality of the drug being said to depend on the manner in which these processes are carried out If the cakes are not dried sufficiently they appear green and are of inferior quality—good ganja being brown

When fully cured the cakes are stored in the ryots houses where they are packed in date mats in bundles each containing 20 vis es (say 60 lbs) and kept under pressure till sold to dealers

In the Kistna district the soil the conditions under which the crop is grown and the method of manufacture all differ entirely from those described above as much as they do from the practice in Bengal according to Dr Prain's description It is only in one village Da gupad in the Bapatla taluk not far from the borders of Nellore and about 15 miles from the sea coast that any considerable area of the crop is to be found although a little is also grown in one or two of the neighbouring villages The country is a wide open plain of black cotton soil and from its appearance badly or poorly drained The soil is not particularly stiff for the description concerned being in fact a good stiff loam and contains a considerable amount of kankar On the land on which hemp is grown the common crops with which it usually alternates are noted on the margin The crop is grown in open fields some near to and some at a distance from the village but all reasonably accessible In some cases it is cultivated and handled by the ryot who owns the land, but more frequently the cultivation of the land and all the cattle labour required is supplied by the ryot and the planting and handling of the crop is undertaken by others—chiefly Muhammadans of whom there is a considerable settlement in this village Here as in Bengal the plant are raised in seed beds and planted out but except at the time of planting no irrigation is resorted to after the crop is put out into the field

The seed-beds are usually made on the bund of a tank, and are 6 feet wide by 60 feet long. The soil of these beds is dug up with a crowbar and reduced to a fine tilth and levelled. Seed is thus sown at the rate of 4 or 5 seers (of 85 tolas) to a bed; two such beds supplying plants sufficient for an acre of land. The seed is covered with earth strewn over it by hand. The bed is then watered by hand and the watering is repeated daily for about two months as required. The sowing takes place in August. When the plants are 2 feet high they are topped off, and in a few days numerous side branches are put out. The plants are then transplanted into the field.

Land intended for hemp may have carried a crop of hemp in the previous year—19 out of 118 acres planted in Daggupád ' this year (1893-94) being said to have carried hemp in 1892-93—but more usually the crop is alternated with one of those mentioned above. If it follows hemp, heavy manuring is necessary. Cultivation of the land for the crop usually begins with ploughing in July, and between then and October it is ploughed about three times and finally worked with the three-tined grubber (gorru, or seed drill used without its seed hopper and tubes). It is then marked off in 2 feet squares with a marker, similar to the guntala, or scuffle worked without its share. At the angles of each square four or five plants are dibbled into a hole made with a stick, and then they are watered to set the plants. The crop is planted out in October.

The land intended for this crop is manured either with cattle manure or by sheep folding, the application of manure being considerable when the land carries hemp successively year after year.

A month after planting the fields are hand-weeded, and about a fortnight later a plough is run between the rows, and the plants are earthed up slightly. Two months after planting out flowering begins, and then the removal of the male (here as elsewhere termed female) plants begins. They are cut off near the roots and thrown away. This work goes on continuously as long as male plants are found.

About February the plant begins to ripen and the harvest commences. It goes on till the end of March. The plants are cut bodily with the sickle, and are laid out in the field where they grow for three days to dry in the sun. On the fourth day they are tied into small bundles of about ten plants each, and then piled, head and tail, in the field. The heaps are opened, and the bundles re-piled next day, the process being repeated over several days. When the quantity to be dealt with is small, and space allows, the bundles are carried to the grower's house and there piled, but in all cases the crop is finally carried to the house, and a month later the spikes are removed. Each spike is plucked off by hand and then they are spread out on a hard floor in the open for one night in the dew to soften and become pliable. In the morning the spikes are collected and stored in large gunny-bags, being packed closely therein by a man treading them down into the bag. The produce is then ready for sale, and may be kept for as many as two years.

* The crop records of Daggupád give the following results —

	In 1892	In 1893
	ACRES	ACRES
Of the land sown with gánja	86 29	117 8½
Carried—	In 1893	In 1892

Chillies	2 81	2 50
Coriander	4 72	8 27
Indigo	1 69	15 96
Not sown	9 84	4 50

In both localities it is stated that of late years the area planted with hemp has been reduced, the price offered for ganja having fallen with the restriction of the demand owing to the introduction of the system of licensing retail vendors

A few years ago the crop was also grown to some extent in one village in the Pulvondla taluk Cuddapah district but its growth there has now been abandoned. It was then grown as a garden crop in rotation with garden korra (Setaria italica) or garden ragi (Fleusine coracana) the plants being raised in seed bed and then planted out. The method of manufacture adopted there appears to have resembled that still followed in Kistna

FORM I D 28 [Para 116 (6).]

Instructions for identification of Cocaine

Cocaine is a white generally crystalline powder slightly soluble in water, but completely soluble in alcohol. The aqueous solution has a strong alkaline re-action (turns red litmus paper blue) and has a very bitter taste. The aqueous solution, if not carefully prepared and secluded from air, rapidly undergoes decomposition with formation of vegetable growths.

Cocaine produces on the tongue a sudden and characteristic cessation of feeling which lasts only a few minutes. One drop of even a weak solution of the hydrochloride of cocaine, if placed on the tongue, soon produces a decided numbness, but the effect vanishes unless the application is repeated.

Cocaine Hydrochloride is perfectly colourless and soluble in water forming a perfectly colourless solution which is absolutely neutral to litmus paper. The solution of the pure salt keeps fairly well, but in the presence of common impurities is decomposed very easily. In the dry solid state it is perfectly free from odour and undergoes no change by keeping, but as sold, it not unfrequently has a peculiar mousey smell (like that of mice) or even a distinct benzoic powder (like that of frankincense பெருங்காது—சாமபிராணி). Pure cocaine hydrochloride is always distinctly crystalline though much of the commercial article presents an amorphous (without crystalline structure) or a granular appearance.

It will only be necessary to give the results of the chemical examination of these barks in so far as they are likely to explain their action in the fermentation of sugar. Three of the plants curiously enough belong to the natural order Oleaceæ, these are Olea glandulifera the Jasminum and the Ligustrum and like other plants of this order contain a peculiar bitter principle soluble in water and alcohol and a yellow colouring matter called quercetin. Two other barks of the series belong to the same natural family of the Laurels and have a similar composition these are the *Litsea*s. The Hiptage bark contains tannin and is simply astringent and the Gmelina belongs to a class of plants distinguished for their bitterness.

The following table gives at a glance some of the chief features of their composition —

—	Water extract per cent	Spirit extract per cent	Astringent property	Ash	General characters
Kadaly	14.5	1.9	Quercetin	8.2	Bitter
Koppa	22.0	0.3	3 per cent tannin	3.6	Mucilaginous astringent and aromatic
Karukathan	15.3	1.3	8.5 per cent tannin	7.6	Astringent
Mulla	9.6	6.6	Organic acid	7.3	Slightly bitter
Pangala	3.8	12.6	Quercetin	2.8	Bitter and astringent
Do (leaves)	13.3	2.9	Do	4.8	Do do
Sudala	18.0	15.3	5.8 per cent tannin	7.7	Mucilaginous astringent and aromatic
Kumala	23.4	18.8	Organic acid	5.9	Slightly bitter and aromatic

The amounts of extract dissolved out of the barks by water and alcohol were determined in order to ascertain their relative proportion as it would seem that in the absence of much resin the excess of water extract over the spirit extract would indicate mucilaginous matter and on the barks being placed in the toddy which in a fresh state is practically a watery solution of sugar with some albuminous matter the extract would dissolve but as fermentation proceeded alcohol would be formed and mucilage would become insoluble and precipitate carrying down with it the viscid albumen and thus allow the sugar to ferment more rapidly. From the fact that other gum barks besides the *Itia*s such as Aydia calycina and Guruma tomentosa are largely used in clarifying sugar it is evident that some such object as this is intended in their employment. The astringent qualities of most of the above bark are no doubt used for the purpose of forming insoluble compounds with albuminous matter in saccharine solutions just as hops are used to remove this substance from malt liquor in the ordinary process of brewing beer. The hops are found to prevent in a great measure the tendency of the beer to become sour in consequence of the conversion of alcohol into acetic acid and in warm climates where such liquors are apt to run into acetous fermentation very rapidly it is necessary to employ astringent drugs to regulate the formation of alcohol and prevent the development of acetic acid.

The natives consider these barks a necessary ingredient in making spirit for the following reasons. Firstly they diminish the too great sweetness of the toddy sugar and secondly they render the spirit more intoxicating. The first of these phenomena is accounted for by the chemical fact that the sugar breaks up during fermentation into two other bodies alcohol and carbonic acid and in the second place the barks enable the operator to obtain a larger proportion of alcohol from his toddy than he could get from leaving it to brew without such adjuncts. The analysis of the barks has revealed no principle of poisonous or intoxicating property and therefore the idea of their directly communicating a potency to the spirit is without foundation, and besides, as the spirituous liquor is submitted to distillation afterwards, any alkaloid, such as strychnine, would be left behind in the retort. Some of the barks are aromatic and these most likely are used to flavour the resulting spirit, which would be the case if the aroma resided in a volatile oil. It is probably a spirit of this kind that Dr Ainslie refers to under the title of Puttai charayum or bark spirit, an alcoholic liquor in which barks of various acacias are used in the manufacture.

In addition to the barks already mentioned, the following is a list of others used in different parts of India for this purpose. They are all characterized by their astringency —

Acacia Arabica	Terminalia bellerica
Do leucophlæa	Do tomentosa
Do ferruginea	Ligustrum robustum
Do jacquemontei	Phyllanthus emblica
Anogeissus latifolia	Shorea robusta

A plant is used by toddy sellers on the Eastern Coast for quite a different purpose, it is employed for ostensibly regenerating stale liquors. The plant is Carulluma adscendens and is called in Telugu “Pulambarai.” From information received through the Revenue Department from the Abkari Inspector, Balacheruvu Circle, it appears that the bruised fresh plant increases the gravity of toddy and consequently its intoxicating properties. This also gives to stale toddy the appearance and smell of that freshly drawn. A few bruised soap-nuts are then sometimes worked into the toddy between the fingers and the contents of the pot are stirred up so that a froth, as if from freshly fermented juice, rises to the top. The toddy may be many days old, but so complete is the process of renewal that experienced judges are often deceived.

From an examination of the Pulambarai plant it is found to be very acrid and bitter, and contains a caoutchouc-like substance, a resin similar to fluavil and a bitter principle. It resembles in its composition the Yecum (Calotropis), a well-known plant of the same natural order, which has very active medicinal qualities and is poisonous in large doses. The use of soap-nuts to form a froth on beverages corresponds with the use of preparations of Quillaria bark in England and America for the purpose of giving a ‘head’ to aerated drinks, but the small quantity employed produces no injurious effects whatever on the system.

FORM T 10 [Para 71 (2) (c)]

Instructions for Sealing and Marking Skins used in the Transport of Toddy from Native States to British Territory

The following instructions are issued for the guidance of the Inspectors of the Bellary Hospet Kurnool Nandyal and Annam Districts in the sealing and marking of skins used in the transport of toddy from Native States —

1 The toddy is transported principally in skins of varying capacity and in order that no delay may occur at the chowkies when the toddy is passing through the contents of each skin must be recorded beforehand. Notice should be given to all toddy shopkeepers that in order to avoid the necessity for measuring the contents of skins brought to the chowkies with toddy each time they are transported the contents of each skin will be marked beforehand that the Inspector will be at each chowkie on a stated day before the commencement of the toddy season to seal and mark skins with their capacity and that skins brought to the chowkies with toddy on or after that day which are not so sealed and marked will be detained until the contents can be ascertained by actual measurement. Dates should be similarly fixed in the succeeding months for marking any other skins which may be subsequently presented.

2 On the presentation of a skin to the Inspector he will select a convenient place in the neck for the seal and punch a hole in the leather to run the shank of the rivet through. He will then put the shank of the rivet through the hole with the head inside, put on the washer, insert a piece of iron nail or some other heavy object into the neck and rest the head of the rivet on it. He will then hammer the part of the shank which protrudes above the washer until it is quite flattened down and the junction between it and the washer disappears. He should then place the die on the surface so prepared and give it a few smart blows with the hammer holding it firmly on the seal at the same time. If it is firmly held and not hit too hard it will not shift its position and will leave an excellent impression. The shank of the rivet should project about $\frac{1}{2}$ of an inch through the washer before it is hammered. If it is too long it must be cut down. In selecting a portion for the rivet care must be taken to choose an important (large) piece of leather in the neck. The bags do not consist of whole skins and might be ripped up and the piece containing the seal might be affixed to a larger receptacle. Skins must occasionally be remeasured as a check against this fraud. When it is intended to do this the owner should be informed that the skin is to be brought empty to the chowkie on the return journey and that it will not be passed again without being remeasured.

3 Each skin must be allotted a number by which it will be known in the Inspectors and the chowkie register. Paint will be the most convenient way of marking the skin if it will stick to the damp leather. As this is doubtful a second leather rivet should be fastened close to the first and have the number stamped on it with dies which will be supplied for the purpose as well. The painted numbers will be stencilled on to the skin with white paint thus —

Care should be taken to commence the word "Gallons" on the neck and carry it across on to the main skin.

4 The Inspector will maintain a register in the appended form in which he will enter all skins &c marked by him. Applicants for registration of receptacles must be called upon to elect within reasonable limits through what chowkie or chowkies they propose to transport their toddy and having so elected should be warned that their skins if presented at any other chowkie will be treated as not marked. An extract from the Inspector's register will be
